The story of Liongo and his younger kinsman.

At about the time of their paternal kinman's death they were in the land of Shira and their elder kinsman was a ruler. At the time of his death their elder kinman migrated and they came to Shika. Liongo wished to reign in the kingdom of his father; and his younger kinman desired the kingdom. And many people liked the younger man; and others, who were fewer, liked Liongo. Liongo made men fear him by his great strength and by his personality.

The people made sedition against him until Liongo grew greatly loved and he fought them and they could not withstand him; and he defeated them. So the people of the city met together; and a man stood out from amongst them, and he said, "Give us advice, for we cannot cope with Liongo," and they said, "Let us go as though in agreement with him, and we can make a plot and imprison him."

And they told the younger kinsman, "Be at ease! When we have wrought our plot against Liongo, we will give you the rulership." And he said to them, "Well I will agree to whatever you do."

Then they went and said to Liongo, "We have come to you, Liongo. The rulership is thine, nor is there anyone else. So, grant us thy bounty." So he gave them of his bounty and they stayed with him many days, and then they raised him and bound him and sent and sent him into a cell.

And his mother, at this time, was alive. They put him into a cell and waited many days. He recked his thoughts for a means to escape from the cell, but could think of none. His mother every day sent food to him by a slave-girl. Liongo said to the slave-girl:
